The Companion was one of the creepiest books I have ever read. It isn't gory or what you would expect from a horror novel. The author would casually write in tiny hints about what was going on that made you super uneasy, and left you with some chills coursing through your body.

The Companion focuses on Lucy Blunt who I have to say is like the queen of the unreliable narrator. All through the book I was wondering just who she did and did not kill, and if she actually was a thief as well. The book flips between past and present as Lucy reflects on her life as she waits to be hanged for her crimes.

Books like this really pique my interest and prompt me to dive right in! The creepy factor definitely lingers throughout the entire book and the twists were steady and consistent. I really like how Margot and Agatha's friendship progressed, and the subtle romance with Barrett was just enough to add another dynamic to the plot without taking away from the main story or it's gothic vibes.
